RUN NO 9 : Nobby Clark and his car

The only times we saw Nobby, apart from the post-exercise beers, was when he was touring around warmly and comfortably ensconced in his car. He explained afterwards that it was the only way he'd been able to complete setting the run.

A run for which the younger and fitter of the pack thank you, Nobby; the rest of us remain silent. It started off with no less than three falsies at the first check and this set the pattern for the rest of the run. Midway thru' the run, two distinct packs had evolved - one lot virtuously following paper while the 'thinking' pack stayed on the nearer ridge and viewed with envy those who'd descended into the vally and clambered up the other side. When the latter pack stumbled up to Umhlanga Rocks Drive, like well-trained hashers, they turned right and headed directly towards the beer.

To no avail did Nobby exhort them to turn back and find paper, their heads were hanging, tongues lolling and the remembered scent of hops was transcending Nobby's harangue. The fact that, at this stage, he had the window open only two inches (the rain was getting in, he said) might have had a bearing on the matter. Then the rain came down and this obviously affects older hashers more as they were overtaken by the 'A' team long before home.

T-SHIRTS :

Paul Lewis is arranging for these to be procured and, as Paul is always efficient, these should soon be available for purchase so make sure next week, that you bring along more than just beer money.

Talking of T-shirts brings to mind Brian Orton's. Running behind him (I never did get in front of him) I felt in imminent danger for on the back of his shirt were the words, "Blasting and Excavating". It is plain to see that Brian is a gentleman (being a hasher of long standing) and, knowing Brian's eating habits, one can only thank him for the warning to those running behind him.
