Run No. 29 : HUGH WHITE

Well they say that the Scots have short arms and deep pockets. Hugh was certainly a tight arse with the paper. On reflection this was a most unorthodox run. Generally the distances between checks were too long yet the Hare managed to keep the pack together. This was done by commencing the new trail fairly close to the checkpoint with a solitary piece of paper and then laying the next piece of paper some few hundred metres further on. The front runner would then be totally confused as to whether or not he was in fact on the trail and would wander around aimlessly thus giving the back runners an opportunity of resting at the check. Another ploy used by the Hare was the laying of paper very close to the checkpoint. Front runners would then disregard the trail as being an obvious false and would dash off in every other direction looking for the trail when in fact the paper indicated the correct trail. Brian Orton actually mentioned after the run that one had to concentrate so carefully on trying to find paper that there wasn't sufficient time to feel exhausted! I noticed this as we ran up the hill away from the Umhlanga Sewerage Works but perhaps it was the smell that had something to do with it. Another interesting feature of this run was the speed at which the pack headed for home as soon as it began to get dark. It's amazing how the back runners manage to keep up with the body of the pack when there is a danger that they are going to be lost in the Hawaan bush for the night!

This was good hashing and it was a pity that there were not more Hash men out to appreciate the run.

HASH FLASH:

With winter drawing near it is suggested that Hash men equip themselves with a small torch - just in case.
